Homework 5

1. My biggest challenge for this assignment was just using 1 CSS file. I ended up having to use 3 different files because I built my HTML skeletons first, thinking I would style things with the same classes the same way. However, I ended up having to make minor changes for a lot of elements I initially thought would be the same—thus, I just separated out my CSS files into different files. This definitely wouldn't be sustainable for a real world project, so I'll have to learn to plan better in the future, and allow my code to be more flexible. Another challenge was learning flex box, and getting things to align perfectly well. I overcame these learning curves by just spending some time on W3Schools and MDN to make sure I knew how these CSS rules worked.
2. My brand identity is primarily reflected through color choice, photography (images), as well as subtle details such as border radius and using a dotted border instead of just a straight line. The look and feel I was going for was definitely the warm and welcoming bakery, something similar to “grandma’s kitchen.” I wanted my website to reflect the delicious aromas of a real cinnamon shop. I went with cool pops of color such as the mint green and dark blue for a more modern twist.
